Marginalities in Indian Writing

Since the twentieth century, literary texts from varied contexts in India have opened up new discursive spaces, from within which the idea of the normative is problematized. Positions of marginality, whether geographical, caste, gender, disability, or tribal, offer the need to interrogate the idea of the normative as well as constitutions of the canon. Though this engagement has been part of literary academic analysis, it has just begun making its foray into the syllabus of English departments of Indian universities. This paper hopes to introduce undergraduate students to perspectives within Indian writing that acquaint them with both experiences of marginalization, as well as the examination of mode of literary stylistics that offer a variation from conventional practice.

Literature in cross cultural encounters

Acknowledging literature's status as an important medium in making sense of the world we live in, this paper will enable students to critically view their location within a larger globalized context. By reading texts cross-culturally, students will engage with people's experience of caste/class, gender, race, violence and war, and nationalities and develop the skills of cross-cultural sensitivity. The paper will give them the vocabulary to engage with experiences of people from varying cultures and backgrounds, particularly relevant in contemporary times as these issues continue to be negotiated in the workplace as well as larger society.
